The recent partnership struck between newly promoted Premier League club Brentford FC and cryptocurrency exchange platform CoinJar was heavily indicative of increasing collaboration between the crypto and sporting sectors.

Speaking to InsiderSport, Jason Fielding, a Commercial Consultant in sport & entertainment, who played a key role in brokering the Brentford-CoinJar deal, discussed the exchange's partnership with The Bees and highlighted why crypto firms are being drawn towards sports, football in particular, and vice versa.

Here we take a look at the platforms that have made it onto the Financial Conduct Authority's crypto register - and what this means for investors.

Buying and selling cryptocurrencies such as Bitcoin and Ethereum isn't regulated. This is one of the reasons it is very risky as there is no protection if your money is lost or stolen. Valuations can also be volatile and the FCA has warned that investors should be prepared to lose all their money.

One area where the FCA does have some power though is with anti-money laundering.

Talking football and Brentford with Hermann Hreidarsson

The Brentford that begin an exciting new adventure in the Premier League this Friday night could scarcely be further removed from the club Hermann Hreidarsson played for in the late nineties.

When the big Icelandic defender arrived at Griffin Park for a club record £750,000 fee in September 1998, following businessman Ron Noades down the leagues from Crystal Palace, they'd just been relegated to the fourth tier.

Now the Bees are set to grace the top flight for the first time in 74 years and host Arsenal first up in their stunning £70million Community Stadium, opened just last year.

United by a passion for blockchain technology and the revolutionary implications of cryptocurrency, CoinJar founders Asher Tan and Ryan Zhou remain the company's driving force.
